In this extract, a young boy called Tom is staying with his Aunt and Uncle. Unable to sleep, he explores their house at midnight and finds a strange door, on the other side of which he finds a garden.

There is a time, between night and day, when landscapes sleep. Only the earliest riser sees that hour; or the all-night traveller, letting up the blind of his railway carriage window, will look out on a rushing landscape of stillness, in which trees and bushes and plants stand immobile and breathless in sleep - wrapped in sleep, as the traveller himself wrapped his body in his coat or his rug the night before.

This grey, still hour before morning was the time in which Tom walked into his garden. He had come down the stairs and along the hall to the garden door at midnight; but when he opened that door and stepped out into the garden, the time was much later. All night - moonlit or swathed in darkness - the garden had stayed awake; now, after that night-long vigil, it had dozed off.

The green of the garden was greyed over with dew; indeed, all its colours were gone until the touch of sunrise. The air was still, and the tree shapes crouched down upon themselves. One bird spoke; and there was a movement when an awkward parcel of feathers dislodged itself from the tall fir tree at the corner of the lawn, seemed for a second to fall and then at once was swept up and along, outspread, on a wind that never blew, to another, farther tree: an owl. It wore the ruffled, dazed appearance of one who has been up all night.

Tom began to walk round the garden, on tiptoe. At first he took the outermost paths, gravelled and box edged¹, intending to map for himself their farthest extent. Then he broke away impatiently on a cross path. It tunnelled through the gloom of yew trees arching overhead from one side, and hazelnut stubs from the other: ahead was a grey green triangle of light where the path must come out into the open again. Underfoot the earth was soft with the humus² of last year's rotted leaves. As he slipped along, like a ghost, Tom noticed, through gaps in the yew trees on his right, the flick of a lighter colour than the yew: dark - light - dark - light - dark ... The lighter colour, he realised, was the back of the house that he was glimpsing, and he must be passing behind the line of yew trees that faced it across the lawn.

- 1. Box edged with a box hedge running around the boundary on each side where it meets the lawn
- 2. Humus the part of soil that consists of dead plants that have begun to decay

Spend 30 minutes on Questions 1-4 (comprehension and analysis), including the time you take to read the passage.

Re-read the opening paragraph (lines 1 to 5).
1.	Who does the writer say is awake at this time? (2 marks)
Re-rea	nd the second paragraph (lines 6 to 10).
2.	Give a quotation that suggests the garden is quiet. (1 mark)
Re-rea	nd the third paragraph (lines 11 to 16).
3.	a. Give a quotation that shows you the bird looks ungraceful or moves ungracefully.
	b. Explain how your quotation shows this. Consider the meaning of the words and their associations. (5 marks)

Re-read the final paragraph (line 17 to the end).
 4. What does the writer want you to feel about the garden? Use quotations to explain your ideas and remember to consider the meanings of words and their associations. You could think about: Tom's reaction to the garden.
The atmosphere created by the description.
(7 marks)
